Glenwood Announces Appointment of Christy Castleberry as New CEO

BIRMINGHAM, AL – A new President and CEO is leading Glenwood, Alabama's oldest provider of services to people with autism, as of October 1, 2024. Christy Castleberry, the organization's former Chief of Staff, replaces Ken Oliver, who recently retired.

The Board of Directors unanimously appointed Christy Castleberry as the new CEO back in January, praising her dedication and long-standing service to the organization. Castleberry brings more than two decades of experience to her new role, having held various key positions at Glenwood since joining the team in 1998. Her extensive background includes overseeing compliance, human resources, risk management, and health services. She has also chaired Glenwood's accreditation committee and played a critical role in maintaining program integrity.

"I've had the pleasure of working with Christy on the board for several years and she's more than qualified and very capable, but most importantly her heart is in the right place," said Andy Martin, Chair of Glenwood's Board of Directors. "We're very optimistic about the future."

Castleberry's rise through the organization began in 1998 as a Secretary in Adult Services, followed by multiple promotions, including Director of Human Resources, Vice President of Administration, and ultimately Chief of Staff. She holds a bachelor's degree in business administration from Troy State University and a master's degree in business management from Faulkner University.

Glenwood is a non-profit agency dedicated to serving children, adolescents, and adults with autism and other behavioral health needs since 1974. Glenwood remains committed to its mission of enabling individuals with autism and other mental health challenges to live meaningful lives.
